I entirely enjoyed my six-month stay in Madison, Wisconsin as a visiting scholar at the department of educational policy studies, school of education, University of Wisconsin-Madison, sponsored by professor William J. Reese. During my stay, I spent most of the time in the Memorial Library and the collection room of the Wisconsin State Historical Society that is located in the campus, consulting the stuffs concerning my research topic on the history of American education. In addition to the very rich collection that is really helpful for my research, the librarians were always providing me with invaluable advices. One librarian let me know a contact information that enabled me to meet and interview a key person who lived in Connecticut State who talked to me a very interesting personal story concerning the Mississippi freedom school (See photo.1). Another librarian gave me the contact information of the authors of the books on one-room school history in Wisconsin State. I could meet them in Madison too to ask many questions about the daily experience of one-room school in 1950s and early 1960s Wisconsin. I also participated in many places, formal and informal, inside and outside the university, to discuss and exchange research ideas with each other. During my short stay in New York City, I came to be acquainted with some educational researchers and practical educators who are seeking the social justice education. I visited the schools where they taught to have conversation with them and share the viewpoint on the school reform in American and Japanese situation. It was very interesting and exciting experience.
